

Register for arkansasbusiness.com | Site Help | Contact ABPG

username password SIGN IN

> ADVERTISEMENT

Search ArkansasBusiness.com enter keywords here START

home news research people events jobs links

Tuesday, November 20, 2007 7:51:28 PM

Free daily eNews

Sign up for daily updates from the Arkansas Business newsroom!

GO!

arkansas industry news

Agriculture & Poultry

Architecture

Banking & Finance

Business Services

Construction

Education

Energy

Government & Politics

Health Care

Insurance

Investments

Legal

Manufacturing

Media & Marketing

Nonprofits

Public Companies

Real Estate

Restaurants & Food

Retail

Small Business

Technology & Telecom

Tourism

Transportation

arkansas business news story

Ark. Judge Says Law Allowing Payday Loans Is Constitutional

By The Associated Press

11/20/2007 3:27:01 PM

LITTLE ROCK (AP) _ A state judge ruled Tuesday that an Arkansas law allowing "payday loan" fees that exceed the state's interest limits is constitutional, setting up an eventual challenge before the Arkansas Supreme Court.

Pulaski County Circuit Judge Barry A. Sims did not hear any additional testimony or evidence in the lawsuit challenging the 1999 Arkansas Check Cashers Act. The Arkansas Supreme Court last year reversed and remanded the case to Sims for the second time after disagreeing with the judge's ruling that those suing had not exhausted their administrative appeals.

Sims said he had previously ruled from the bench that the act was constitutional, but a written order did not include that ruling. Sims asked attorneys for the Arkansas State Board of Collection Agencies to prepare an order upholding the cashers act.

"Is there anything I need to do other than declare on the record that the act is constitutional?" Sims asked before

- Submit A Whisper
- Submit Calendar Event
- Submit News Release
- Advertise Online
- Buy Gift Subscriptions

> ADVERTISEMENT

> ADVERTISEMENT

Change font size a a a	print preview send article
---	-------------------------------

research & lists

- Book of Lists
- Trends & Analysis
- New Business Lists
- Company Profiles
- Manufacturer's Directory
- Buy 1 Year of Archive Access

our services

- Manage Your eNews
- Register for ArkansasBusiness.com
- Subscribe to Arkansas Business Print Edition
- Forgot Your Password?
- Requesting Reprints & Article Rights Inquiries
- RSS / XML Feeds
- Advertise Your Company on ArkansasBusiness.com
- Download the ArkansasBusiness.com Meda Kit

Jobs on

ArkansasBusiness.com

- Post a Job Listing
- Search Job Listings
- Post a Resume
- Search Resumes

announcing his ruling.

Todd Turner, an Arkadelphia lawyer representing those suing the Arkansas State Board of Collection Agencies and its members, said he planned to appeal Sims' ruling again to the state's highest court. Turner said that, unlike past appeals, this challenge will directly address the constitutionality of the law.

"The act has not been directly addressed, and that was our aim today," Turner told reporters after the hearing. "Even though we disagree with his ruling, we're glad that we have a ruling and now we can take that to the Supreme Court."

> ADVERTISEMENT

Turner has argued that the act violates the state constitution by allowing payday lenders to make consumer loans with interest rates of more than 17 percent annually.

Through a payday loan in Arkansas, a customer writing a check for $400, for example, typically would receive $350. The lender would keep the check for about two weeks without cashing it and, thereby, allowing the customer time to buy back the check.

The $50 charge on the $350 loan for 14 days equates to 371 percent, well above Arkansas' usury limit of 17 percent.

Sims originally dismissed the lawsuit in 2003 on a series of grounds, ranging from those suing had no standing to file the lawsuit, that the agency was immune from suits and that the suit didn't offer facts that the court could use to grant relief. The Supreme Court reversed Sims' decision in 2005 and sent the case back to him. Sims then ruled that the plaintiffs had not exhausted their administrative appeals, while also saying that the act was constitutional.

The plaintiffs in the case include several customers who have used check cashing businesses and several private individuals, including North Little Rock Mayor Patrick Hays.

Tom Thrash, the attorney representing the state board, said he was pleased with Sims' ruling.

"If they appeal it, we'll respond and we feel like (the Supreme Court) will uphold the act," Thrash said.

(Copyright 2007 Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten, or redistributed.)

[Link to this article]

today's headlines

- Home Bancshares To Sell White River Stake For $19.9 Million
- Ark. Judge Says Law Allowing Payday Loans Is Constitutional
- Gloomy Time Ahead As Growth Slows, Forecaster Says
- State Unemployment Holds At 5.7 Percent
- Barington Capital Increases Dillard's Stake
- Dillard's Posts $11.3 Million Loss; Stock Rises On Buyback News
- Tyson Foods To Revise Labels After USDA Revokes OK On 'No Antibiotics' Claim

featured links

Governor's Work-Life Balance Award
Little Rock Guest Guide
Sissy's Log Cabin
ClintonLittleRock.com
Agrobotics
East Harding Construction
Little Rock Family
Riviera Condominiums
Community Resource Group

About ABPG | Terms Conditions & Notices | Privacy Policy | Contact | FAQ

122 East Second Street :: Little Rock, AR 72201 :: (501)372-1443 or (888)322-6397
 Copyright © 2007, Arkansas Business Limited Partnership. All rights reserved.